Revitalizing our parish culture:

When we think “mission” in the Church, many people often visualize missionary priests and religious in faraway lands evangelizing peoples that have never heard the gospel before. We don’t always see our parish home as ripe missionary territory.

Yet, if we have been paying attention over the decades, we are aware that American society has become far less religious and fewer people are attending Sunday Liturgy. One of the fastest growing populations among 18-29 years olds is those who identify themselves with “No religious affiliation”, or the nones.¹ Add to this that many Ukrainian Catholics in America have moved away from towns where they grew up to find work and a better future. This creates many challenges for existing parish communities.

But with any challenge there is also opportunity. Our parishes can become more vibrant by creating a culture that is missionary. A missionary culture is one that values reaching out and inviting people who may have no affiliation with the Ukrainian Catholic Church, but they may live in the neighborhoods around our parishes. A missionary parish is like an outpost in the wilderness, where the Church goes out and invites people into relationship with Jesus and His Church.

In contrast, a maintenance parish seeks to maintain the status quo. Keeps things as they are and don’t rock the boat. Hopefully, something will change. Maybe thousands of immigrants from Ukraine will suddenly come looking for work and fill our ranks again and all will be well?

To move from maintenance to mission requires a change of heart and pastoral conversion on the part of our priests and people. It requires a change in our values and parish culture.
